John, 1900, with the following results:

It was the United States' policy, the Supreme Court decided, to "open the door" to all immigrants, even those who were considered undesirable. The government's argument that it could exclude certain groups of people was rejected. The decision was a landmark victory for civil liberties.

The Court also ruled that the government could not discriminate against immigrants based on their race or ethnicity. This was a significant step towards equality for all people in the United States.

The decision was a major win for civil liberties and set a precedent for future cases involving immigration and national security.
